This Week in Guard History. Oct. 19, 1944: Aachen, Germany --- Newly promoted Lt. Gen. Raymond S. McLain assumes command of the XIX Corps. Two of the three divisions under his command are from the Guard: the 29th, which had soldiers from Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia, and the 30th, with troops from North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee. But dealing with Guard units is no problem for McLain, who began his military career as a private in the Oklahoma Guard in 1912. By 1916, just before McLain's unit, the 1st Oklahoma Infantry, deployed to the Mexican border, he was promoted to first lieutenant. In 1917, as his regiment was assigned to the newly organized 36th Division from Texas and Oklahoma for its deployment to France in World War I, McLain was promoted to captain. He saw combat in France, where he was gassed, but recovered. In the period between the wars, McLain returned to the Oklahoma Guard.

Despite his lack of formal education---he never graduated high school---through determined study and effort, he earned the rank of brigadier general in command of the 45th Division Artillery from Arizona, Colorado and Oklahoma by the time of the 1941 mobilization. During the war, he had a variety of assignments including commanding the 90th Infantry Division, then fighting in Normandy. He found the 90th in complete disarray and worked hard to restore its morale and discipline. Upon his promotion to lieutenant general to command the XIX Corps, he becomes the first Guardsman since the Civil War to hold the rank. The next Guardsman to hold three-star rank would also be an Oklahoman, Lt. Gen. La Vern E. Weber, National Guard Bureau chief from 1974 to 1982.

Recent News Releases

ARMY Retires Huey, Vietnam Stalwart. The UH-1 Iroquois helicopter was officially retired in a ceremony held at Fort Myer, Va., one week ago, ending a service life of more than 50 years to the Army and close to 40 years in the Army Guard. The helicopter, known to most simply as the Huey, was first manufactured in 1956 and fielded to the Army in 1959. Its distinctive nickname came from the pronunciation of its first Army designation of HU-1---for helicopter utility---and later models featured the word Huey emblazoned on the pilot's foot pedals. It was also known for its familiar "whoop, whoop" noise while in flight. More than 15,000 of the aircraft were produced with about half of them being flown during the Vietnam War, linking the helicopter and the conflict probably forever.

"The UH-1, more than any other helicopter or any item of equipment, became the symbol of Vietnam," said Maj. Gen. Raymond Carpenter, the acting director of the Army National Guard. The helicopter earned a reputation for being rugged and able to fly after taking many hits from enemy fire. "I can also attest to you that it was not just a machine," said Brig. Gen. Alberto Jimenez, the Assistant Adjutant General for Maryland and the Army Guard's senior aviator. "It became part of us. It was our lives. It was our friend. It was the aircraft that took us in and out of Vietnam, and it was also the aircraft that saved many countless lives as we rushed the wounded and the sick out of the battlefield." The Army Guard first began receiving the aircraft in the early 1970s and, at one time, the number of Hueys in the Guard hovered around 1,500. "The 'whoop, whoop' of the [aircraft] will remain in our hearts," Jimenez said. "Thank you for a job well done."

Proposal Could Ease Way for Disability Payments. By Kimberly Hefling - The Associated Press, Oct 15, 2009 <http://www.ap.org>. Female soldiers and others serving in dangerous roles behind the front lines in Iraq and Afghanistan have long complained it was hard to prove their combat experience when applying for disability for post-traumatic stress disorder. That could soon change. The Veterans Affairs Department has proposed reducing the paperwork required for veterans to show their experience caused combat-related stress. Even just the fear of hostile action would be sufficient, as long as a VA psychologist or psychiatrist agreed. The VA says the change would streamline claims and recognize the "inherently stressful nature" of war service. The agency is accepting comment until Oct. 23. Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki told lawmakers on Wednesday he's committed to improving trust in the claims process between veterans and the VA, and to helping veterans receive benefits they are entitled to. "We will change the culture," Shinseki said. "I will assure you of that." Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., called it a significant shift in policy.

“Before, and for a long time, I’ve been fighting many times over for the VA not to discourage people from saying they have PTSD,” said Murray, who serves on the Senate Veterans’ Affairs Committee. “We’ve have many cases where veterans were told it’s all in your head.”

Post-traumatic stress disorder can affect anyone who is traumatized by an experience. From the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, more than 134,000 veterans have sought help at a VA facility for possible PTSD, the VA says. The symptoms include flashbacks and anxiety, and for some, it’s so debilitating that it makes it difficult to work after they leave the military. While praising the VA’s effort, veterans service organizations have questioned the requirement for a VA psychologist or psychiatrist to agree the experience caused the disorder. Rep. John Hall, D-N.Y., who chairs a subcommittee with oversight over the disability claims system, said he’s concerned that the proposed rule isn’t comprehensive enough.

The debate is a reflection of the changing battlefield. A World War II-era law established that veterans who “engaged in combat with the enemy” receive special treatment when they seek disability compensation, so it’s less burdensome to prove an injury was from war service. Troops from an infantry or special forces unit are awarded a badge that makes it easier to prove they engaged in combat. Truck drivers, cooks and others in support roles aren’t eligible for the badge but can use other types of documentation or medals, such as a Purple Heart, to prove they were in combat. But veterans and service organizations that work with them have said doing so is often incredibly difficult, in part because of the lack of paperwork kept by many units. About half of all post-traumatic stress disability claims filed by veterans are denied — with the majority of denials coming because the veteran lacks sufficient documentation, the VA has said.
